What Do We Do with the Bible?

Read on cac.org

(Center for Action and Contemplation, Fr. Richard Rohr—weekly summary)

Sunday

The Bible, as a text in travail, mirrors and charts our own human travail and illustrates all these stages from within the Bible. It offers both the mature and immature responses to almost everything, and we have to learn the difference. —Richard Rohr

Monday

If you long for a deeper, more mystical relationship with the unnamable mystery we call God, then read the Bible like a mystic: like someone whose life has been illuminated and transformed by immersion in the very heart of divine love. Read from the heart of compassionate love, not from fear or any anxious need to please, placate, or control. —Carl McColman

Tuesday

We have on our hands a Bible as complicated and dynamic as our relationship with God, one that reads less like divine monologue and more like an intimate conversation. —Rachel Held Evans

Wednesday

It takes all the Bible—and sometimes all our lives—to get beyond the punitiveness and pettiness that we project onto God and that we harbor within ourselves. We have to keep connecting the dots of God's wisdom and grace. —Richard Rohr

Thursday

The Gospel says, "He would never speak to them except in parables" (Matthew 13:34). The indirect, metaphorical, symbolic language of a story or parable seems to be Jesus's preferred way of teaching spiritual realities. —Richard Rohr

Friday

To refuse ourselves these stories is a death by starvation. These spiritual stories sustained our spiritual forebears; without these stories, I suggest that we cannot maintain the imagination required to nurture belief.
